

Yet another successful Children In Need event at Havering Sixth Form College

On Friday 14th November things took on a lighter note at Havering Sixth Form College as both staff and students threw themselves into a variety of fun events in order to raise money for Children in Need.

Large numbers of students dressed up for the occasion; Spartans were seen roaming the corridors, several Tiggers were spotted leaping through the undergrowth but order was restored by several Superwomen who were not afraid to put the pirates and punks in their place. History teacher Graham Korn organised a raffle in his tutor group and the winner had the dubious honour of shaving his head in the main College Atrium in front of hundreds of students. There was a Wild West theme among the Computing staff who were serving refreshments in their department. Some members of the Leisure and Tourism Department also helped to maintain order in their police uniforms.

At the last count, nearly £1200 had been raised for the appeal and the money was still flowing in. College Principal Paul Wakeling, who himself looked like a rather dashing 007, said "it's really encouraging to see so many young people getting into the right spirit, having fun and at the same time raising lots of money for such a worthy cause. Academic success is obviously our main aim but we place tremendous value on a friendly and enjoyable atmosphere in the College and last Friday was one of the nicest days I have known in my time at Havering Sixth Form College".
