

Food Technology students enjoy tasty treats on a tour of top London food halls

Some weird and wonderful tasty treats as well as some high class tucker was on offer to College students on the A2 Food Technology course when they went on a day trip to London.

The students took a tour around the food halls of four top London stores on Friday November 27th.

The day started with a guided tour around Selfridges Food Hall where students got the opportunity to talk to all the department staff who answered foodie questions.

One student tasted her first oyster and all students enjoyed bush tucker in the form of roasted wood ants! The verdict: "Surprisingly, they didn't taste too bad at all," according to most of the group.

The next stop was John Lewis where the group ate their way around a chocolate biscuit promotion. A short walk along New Bond Street and they were at Fortnum and Mason where pate and cheese were tasted, along with more ants - but this time they were covered in chocolate!

Next the students hopped on a Route Master bus to take them to their last stop – Harrods of Knightsbridge, where they mingled with the rich and famous.
